The speaker was on the stand, and so were his body guard, the factotums of the Republican party. The Band played on. them, to speak. The music, starting off into a livelier tune, filled the ears of the audience, and set their feet to stamping. The gentlemen looked at one another in despair for a moment, and then wound their arms around each other like the Siamese twins and determined to brave it out. Defrees waved his left hand several times, and his lips moved as if they said-and we guess they did-"Stop that music." But the music wouldn't stop. The musicians had been paid for a certain amount of sweet sounds, and, like honest men, they determined to give value received for their money. Seeing it was no use to resist fate, Smithand Defrees hugged each other the closer, and stood still until the stipulated number of tunes

If Judge Douglas had spoken here—he understood he had not at any length-he would have told his audience that he, Lincoln, would get right after the nigger; whereas Douglas himself had been following the nigger for fifteen years, that being the chief burthen of his song.

From this point the speaker took up the train of the argument of his Cincinnati speech, and gave his hearers a regular Abolition lecture of about an hour's length, contending that Congressionel legislation alone could make a free State, and soil and climate had nothing to do with the
